I was in OfficeMax waiting in line when I spotted a beginners Kakuro book. I never heard of Kakuro before but the book looked intriguing so I thumbed through it and liked the concept. I'm not a good

Sudoku person and this looked like a nice alternative because I do like puzzles. Well, I smashed through that book and I was hooked. That led me to step up to the Green Belt Kakuro which I think was a perfect graduation for me. The Green Belt Kakuros are bigger and offer a few more combinations which tax my brain just enough to be challenged but not enough to quit. I'm starting to pick up on certain combinations and the Green Belt is beginning to get a little easier. Whereas it took me 45+ minutes to do a single puzzle before, midway through the book I'm down to about 1/2 hour for a puzzle. That's not to say that I'm no longer challenged. There are some puzzles I've had to retrace and see where did I add wrong or where did I assume a correct combination because now I'm in an impossible situation. I think that's all part of the fun and the challenge and it makes me slow down and be more attentive the next time.

By Pink Panther
I was anxious to try this new, more complex version of sudoku or kenken, however you look at it. But these are unplayable simply because the tiny squares you have to work with are WAY TOO SMALL to make any small annotations of number possibilities as you try to work through the complex layout. I had to return it as unusable.

By Kristine A. Nicholas
I love Kakuro puzzles, and this series is among my favorites. That said, it is among my favorites because it has a real variety of puzzles. Every book in this series has a bunch of puzzles that are on the easier side, a bunch that are of medium difficulty, and a bunch that are more difficult. They could have done a better job sorting the puzzles and putting them in the most appropriate level book. I actually have found more easy puzzles in the green belt book than in the white belt book. I have not yet finished the Black Belt book (I completed the White belt, the Green belt, and the Brown belt), but that one does seem to be a bit more difficult so far. Otherwise, all three of other books are about the same level (or variety of levels).

Kakuro are language-free number puzzles that use logic and require just simple arithmetic to solve. This book contains 150 kakuros. It takes cue from the belt colors in martial arts: white is for novices, green for intermediates, brown for very accomplished players, and black for those consummate experts who crave a challenge.
